The traditions of Songkran have a long history and are still observed in the Thai homeland of Sipsong Panna in southwestern China, in Laos, and in northern Burma. Songkran, or the Thai New Year, is actually the celebration of the passing of the sun from Taurus into Aries. It is a solar event that marks the beginning of a new astrological year, and this is very important in Thailand. Songkran day is always April 13. Write a letter to someone in Thailand in which you compare and contrast the similarities and differences between Thai New Year and the New Year celebrations we have in the United States.

The Mystery of the Eye Pad

Ms. Chat was an incurable chatterbox. Every juicy, personal event that happened at Sacajawea High School managed to pass through her lips, whether it was a student's misdemeanor or a teacher's tax problems. Her curly gray hair spiraled out from her head in all directions like antennae tuned to gossip channels in the school. Ms. Chat couldn't stop chatting!

"Did you hear about Mr. Shop's eye injury? He might need to get an eye pad," Ms. Chat whispered to her fellow gossip and office cohort, Ms. Bizzy.

"Did something happen to his eye in his metal shop class?" asked Ms. Bizzy.

"I don't know what happened, but I plan to find out," said Ms. Chat.

"With his earring and wild salt-and-pepper hair, he will look like a pirate if he has an eye patch," giggled the other woman. "It is terrible to think about that! I really hope he is not having a serious vision problem. How did you hear about this situation?"

"I heard him mentioning getting an eye pad to another teacher yesterday as he turned in his class attendance sheets. Maybe he just went to the eye doctor, and an eye patch was suggested to help his vision," said Ms. Chat.

The two talkative office birds chirped for twenty more minutes about the poor teacher who was possibly about to turn into a pirate look-alike. They even joked about hiring a "private eye" to help them figure out the mystery of the eye pad, or eye patch, or whatever vision aid the metal shop teacher would soon be wearing.

During the course of their chatter, students and teachers passed through the office and heard bits and pieces of information about the unfortunate shop teacher. A storm of silly stories was soon gathering over the school. By the end of the day, according to the rumor mill, the poor man was about to go blind and was going to have to retire soon.

One of his students, a slender, delicate creature named Stacy Twigg, had heard the rumors and was very concerned about her favorite teacher. She shyly approached him after class with an inquiry.

"Mr. Shop, I heard that you are having eye problems. Are you okay? Everyone is talking about how you will be wearing an eye patch and may be going blind. Is that true? Can you tell me what is wrong?" asked the concerned girl.

Name: _____

"So that is what everyone is saying? How interesting," said Mr. Shop. "My vision is fine."

"Oh, that's good," said Stacy. "I wonder why everyone is thinking you have eye problems."

"Actually, I think I know. It might have to do with a new toy I bought yesterday. I admit that I have been bragging about it, and some people might not know what it is. I have a feeling this new device had something to do with the rumors going around about me," said the teacher with a twinkle in his very healthy eyes.

Mr. Shop brought out his brand new iPad tablet computer to show Stacy, and they both had a hearty laugh.

The Case of the Woman with the Red Scarf

Courageous Sergeant Crimebuster sat in his blue sedan at the side of the street with his dependable sidekick, Deputy Detail. They were hot on the trail of the worse traitors in United States history. The traitors were smuggling important secrets to the Russian secret police, and the sergeant knew that an important envelope would trade hands today.

"How will we know who to watch for?" asked the balding, bespeckled deputy. He tried hard, but his mind was not as swift as the sergeant's. Both men wore tan trench coats and sipped black coffee from Styrofoam cups. The deputy had powdered sugar on his chin from his recent encounter with a cinnamon bun. It attacked with a sloppy array of crumbs and icing, but the deputy triumphed in the end. After all, he had to keep up his strength.

"I know that the person passing the envelope is a woman. She will be wearing a red scarf. She looks like a movie star," said the sergeant. He had studied this case well.

The deputy nodded. He reached for a glazed donut. After all, he had to fortify himself for a possible chase.

"When we catch her, we will have broken a tangled web of international deception. They have been passing national security secrets for five years. Unfortunately, her accomplice is a slippery character. For one reason or another, we have never caught him," said Sergeant Crimebuster.

Rain poured down in cold sheets. The pair waited and watched. They knew that the woman would appear in a window booth in the coffee shop across the street. They had heard that her accomplice would meet her there. She would give him the secret envelope. Even though several striking women sat in booths by the windows wearing scarves at their necks as was the fashion of the day, not one wore red.

"The funny thing about this case is that this woman does not know who she is meeting. It is as much a mystery to her as it is to us. Apparently, the accomplice will be looking for her bright red scarf alone to identify our lady.

"The accomplice received his instructions in a note. We photographed it with a telescoping camera lens just before it self-destructed. The funny thing is that the accomplice had no way to contact his superiors. Even if he had a problem with the note's instructions, he had no alternative. He just had to wait for the next contact," explained the sergeant.

"It is amazing we have gotten this far!" exclaimed the deputy.

Name: _____

The minutes trickled by slowly. Rain slid down the windshield. Then, the deputy grabbed the sergeant's arm. There she was! A beautiful woman with sleek black hair sat at the diner booth. Around her neck was the bright red scarf. She ordered coffee and a pastry. After all, she had to fortify herself for this meeting.

The sergeant and his deputy sat up in the car and knocked over their plate of donuts. It didn't matter, though, because they were close to solving their crime. All they had to do was wait. When someone slid into the booth next to the woman, they would pounce like cats after a catnip mouse and arrest both of them. They had to wait for just the right moment.

An hour passed. The raven-haired beauty looked around nervously. She stood up, tucked the envelope under her arm, and went to the cashier. Obviously, the accomplice had encountered a problem. She had to get out of there!

The sergeant and his deputy moved quickly and made their arrest. The beautiful lady surrendered her secrets. All but one: she could not reveal the identity of her accomplice because she did not know him.

In a shadowed booth in the diner, the accomplice watched in horror. There were too many women in scarves! It had made him hesitate, and now all was lost. He had been unable to tell his superiors about one fatal flaw in their plan. He could not recognize the woman with the dazzling red scarf who had the secret envelope. A waitress came by with his credit card receipt.

"Please sign on the red line," said the waitress.

"Please point out which line is red," said the man. He flushed with embarrassment. "You see, I am color blind."
